I was searching around and I found 3 different ways to initialize a variable in C#. First, we can use the keyword var: var i = 0; In the second way, we can use the keywords "new" and "this", and both of them have the same effect: var i = new int(); i = 0; And in the third way, we can use the keywords "const" and "this": const int i = 0; i = 0; All these ways to initialize a variable lead me to a question: Can these three ways be used to initialise a variable, or there is another way that isn't illustrated here? What's the difference between all these ways? A: The first one is a keyword and will initialize the variable in the class scope. The second one will initialize the variable in the scope where it is used, for example: int i; void Foo() { i = i + 10; } It's like the first one, but local and not visible to other methods. The third one will initialize the variable as a const variable and will be a new i initialized on every method call. And this is the best way to initialize a const variable.
